China can be a great place to learn depending on which subject you are studying, which teaching methods work best for you or your personal interests. Whether you're looking to go to school in China, considering enrolling your child in a Chinese school, or just curious to know more, here are answers to frequently asked questions about school programs in China, China's educational practices, and enrolment in school in China. Education is required and free for Chinese citizens aged 6 to 15 but parents must pay fees for books and uniforms. Chinese children all receive a primary and secondary education. Each class averages 35 students. After middle school, parents have to pay for the public school. The majority of families in cities can afford the fees, but in rural China, many students stop their education at the age of 15. For the rich, there are a growing number of private schools in China as well as dozens of international private schools. In high school, Chinese students begin to prepare for the competitive (). Something similar sat for American students, seniors take this test in the summer. The results determine which Chinese university test takers will attend the following year. Chinese students attend classes five or six days a week from the early morning (about 7 a.m.) to early evening (4 p.m. or later). On Saturdays, many schools hold required morning classes in science and mathematics. Many students also attend the school, in the evening and on weekends. Much like tutoring in the West, schools in China offer additional Chinese, English, science and mathematics classes and one-on-one tutoring. Aside from mathematics and science, students take Chinese, English, history, literature, music, art and physical education. China's teaching method differs from Western educational methodology. Rote memorization is emphasized and there is a heavier focus on mathematics, science and Chinese studies. It is also standard practice for classes to be supplemented with comprehensive test prep throughout middle school, middle school, and high school for college entrance exams. Schools in China have after-school activities, such as sports and music lessons, but these activities are not as extensive as those found in international schools and schools in the West. For example, while team sports are becoming more popular, competition between schools is more like an intramural team sports system rather than a competitive system. Schools in China have a break that lasts for several days or a week during China's national holiday in early October. During the Spring Festival in mid-January or mid-February, depending on the lunar calendar, students have one to three weeks off. The next break is for China's work holiday, which occurs in the first few days of May. Finally, students have a summer vacation that is much shorter than in the United States. Summer holidays usually begin in the middle of although some schools schools their holidays in June. The holiday lasts for about a month. While most international schools will only accept Chinese students who have a foreign passport, Chinese public schools are required by law to accept children of legal foreign residents. Admission requirements vary, but most schools require an admission application, patient records, passports, visa information and previous school records. Some, like nurseries and kindergartens, require a birth certificate. Others require letters of recommendation, assessments, on-campus interviews, entrance exams and language requirements. Students who cannot speak Mandarin are usually held back a few grades and usually start in first grade until their language skills improve. All classes except English are taught entirely in Chinese. Going to a local school in China has become a popular choice for expat families living in China but can't afford the high price of international schools. The admissions material at local schools is usually in Chinese and there is little support for families and students who do not speak Chinese. Schools in Beijing that accept foreign students include Fangcaodi Primary School (方村附小). There are over 70 schools approved by China's Ministry of Education to provide foreign education. Unlike local children, foreigners have to pay an annual tuition that varies but starts at about 28,000RMB. Various programs are offered at schools in China for foreigners. An application, copies of visas and passports, school records, physical exams, photography and proof of language skills are all most students need to gain acceptance for undergraduate and postgraduate programs at schools in China. Chinese language skills are typically demonstrated by taking the Hanyu Shuiping Kaoshi (HSK degree). Most schools require a level 6 score (on a scale of 1 to 11) to enter undergraduate and postgraduate programmes. In addition, a benefit for foreigners is that they are exempt from gaokao. Many prospective students consider applying for scholarships to study at schools in China. Foreign students pay more in tuition than local students, but fees are generally much less than students would pay in the United States or Europe. Teaching starts at 23,000RMB annually. Scholarships are available for foreigners. The most common scholarship is given by the Ministry of Education's China Scholarship Council and the Chinese Government. The Chinese government also awards HSK Winner Scholarships for the best HSK test-scorers abroad. One scholarship is awarded per country where the test is administered. There are programs for those who do not speak Chinese. From Mandarin language learning to Chinese medicine to a Master of Business Administration, foreigners can study a range of subjects at schools in China, including Beijing and Shanghai, without speaking a word of Mandarin. The programmes range from a few weeks to years or more. The application process is quite simple and consists of an application, a copy of the visa, passport, school register or diploma, physical degree, and photo. Sometimes, traditional education just doesn't work for kids and teenagers. Whether parents have a traveling lifestyle driven by careers, or a child struggling with a school environment that doesn't encourage positive learning, online high school diploma programs can often be the solution. Even adults in addition to the traditional high school years can take advantage of these programs, reviving their lives while finally earning the diplomas they so desire. If you are considering an online high school diploma for your child (or maybe for yourself!), you need to understand what they are, how they work, and what types of people can really excel in these programs. ONLINE HIGH SCHOOL PATHThese are simply a replacement for traditional in-person high schools. Instead of traveling to the public or private school every day, students learn online, often attending classes in real time in a virtual environment. While each program may vary, the structure usually includes online high school classes, which can often be completed at a time that suits the student's schedule. The learning structure may be different, but the classes themselves resemble a typical secondary school. Penn Foster's diploma program, for example, includes General Math 1 and 2, Earth Science, Basic English, and World History among many others, giving students a well-rounded education and preparing them for college courses. There are also specialized programs that focus on specific careers, such as carpentry, medical care or hospitality. . WHO IS THE IDEAL CANDIDATE? In reality, anyone who wants to earn their high school diploma can take advantage of these programs. This means that working-age adults who finally want to complete their education are really good candidates. But for many young students, these are the perfect option to complete their secondary education in a safe, productive and supportive environment. Parents choose these programs for their children for many reasons, including bullying at school, an overly competitive and stressful attitude, or difficulty learning in a distracting environment. In some cases, students simply learn better online than they do in traditional classes. A teenager may have trouble focusing on classes when peer pressure and other distractions get in the way, but online high school diploma programs can give them a focused, quiet learning environment. There are also situations when a parent's lifestyle or career forces constant travel and relocation. Going from high school to high school can be disruptive to a child's education, so parents can choose online learning to provide consistency that moves with the family. And of course there are also adult students, people who are ready to finally move into a world-class career and enjoy the benefits of holding a high school diploma, which can provide both increases and career stability. WHAT SHOULD I LOOK FOR? If you are ready to choose an online high school degree program for your child or yourself, look for these characteristics... Accreditation: One of the pillars of a quality school is accreditation, which essentially verifies the school through an independent organisation. Online high school programs are accredited by organizations like the Distance Education Accrediting Committee and regional associations like the Commission of High Schools of the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools. Staff Experience & Training: If you are going to trust your child's education to an online school, make sure you have thoroughly researched the staff, check for experience and training, as well as licensing and certifications where appropriate. College Attendance Rates: You likely want your child to transition to college, so choose a school that sends a high percentage of students to tertiary education. While thinking about college, ask school staff about college counseling, SAT prep, and admissions assistance. Curriculum: The special curriculum can have a profound impact on the quality of learning, as well as someone's preparation for college classes. Research the school curriculum and consider both the basic curriculum and the elective courses. While there are many details to consider (such as pricing), if you research these four aspects, you will likely choose a program that will suit the needs of your young student or your own personal goals.
